LEADERSHIP REPORT

May 2019

Dear Friends,

Bacharach has had close ties with Stockton University for decades, serving as a clinical education setting for countless health sciences students, and hiring these skilled clinicians once they have graduated.

One of our clinicians, Jennifer Brooks, PT, DPT, CLT-LANA, was honored in April when she was chosen to deliver the keynote address at the Stockton University Doctor of Physical Therapy Program “Commitment to the Profession Ceremony” April 3, 2019.

The ceremony marks the point at which students are no longer solely learning in the classroom, as they make a symbolic and verbal commitment to the profession of physical therapy and to their future patients.

Jennifer earned her BS and her MPT at the University of Scranton, but demonstrating her extraordinary commitment to the profession, enrolled at Stockton University to complete her training as a Doctor of Physical Therapy in 2016. Jennifer is certified in lymphedema management via the Lymphology Association of North America, and has 20 years of oncology rehabilitation experience.

Her keynote presentation focused on concepts of resilience in professional practice. Jennifer noted that healthcare professionals, including physical therapists, while quite dedicated to caring for their patients, may neglect themselves. She posited that without proper self-care, clinicians cannot do their best in caring for others.

You can see her remarkable presentation here.
